Mobile and geo-location

Google mobile apps

Google offers a variety of mobile applications that you can download onto your smartphone, and some of these apps, such as Search, Maps and Latitude, incorporate geo-location features. Some parents may be concerned about their teenager sharing their location with others. Each app allows you to adjust the privacy setting, so that you can share as much or little as you want.

Search: When you first use Search on your phone, you are asked whether or not you'd like to allow Search to use your location information. In Android, the browser settings page allows you to turn off browser location entirely or clear the sites that you have previously given permission to access your location. On other phones (BlackBerry or iPhone, for example) you can disable location through the options in the app itself.

Maps: Google Maps makes use of your web browser's geo-location feature to determine your location. Google Maps accesses your location from your browser and can only do so with your explicit consent. The first time you use the My Location feature, your browser will ask whether you're happy to share your location with Google Maps. If you deny this, your location is not shared with Google Maps and the My Location feature will be deactivated.

Latitude: Google Latitude gives you control over how much or how little location information you want to share with whomever you choose. Before someone can view your location, you must either send the person a location request by adding them as a friend or accept their location request and choose to share back your location. You can sign out and turn off Google Latitude to stop sharing your location with friends at any time from the privacy menu. For more information about how to set your privacy settings on Latitude, take a look at this short video.

Users are advised before using such social sharing buttons that they do so at their own discretion and note that the social media platform may track and save your request to share a web page respectively through your social media platform account.
